Historical Note

Throughout the first half of the 20th Century, Hartford was known throughout the nation as America's "park city." Building on the initiative of the Reverend Horace Bushnell in the 1850s, Hartford transformed a virtual wasteland along its Hog River into America's first public city park – an oasis in the midst of a growing industrial and commercial municipality. Designed by landscape architect Jacob Weidenmann, the City Park (later re-named for Bushnell) became the cornerstone of a chain of parks, large and small, throughout the city. The park system reached its zenith around 1900 under the direction of two visionary superintendents, Theodore Wirth and George A. Parker. The expert direction of Wirth and Parker lasted for nearly half a century. They were aided by designs of the Olmsted firm. During that time, Hartford's chain of parks and projected linking parkways became a model for cities across the nation, as they sought to introduce space for relaxation and recreation into increasingly crowded urban settings.

Inspired by the city's initiative, public benefactors like brothers Walter and Henry Keney, Colonel Albert Pope, Charles M. Pond, and Elizabeth Colt added large tracts, either as outright gifts of land or through funds dedicated to the purchase of additional parkland. Parks had many uses and amenities, such as golf courses, baseball diamonds, tennis courts, children's gardens, boating, and picnic facilities. Combined with experimental gardens and the nation's first public rose garden, Hartford's parks afforded all social and economic levels of the city's populace the opportunity for healthful recreation.

Scope and Content

The Hartford City Parks Collection at the Hartford History Center documents the growth and extent of the city's pioneering efforts in creating and developing municipal parks. Series I contains albums with newspaper clippings, primarily from Hartford papers. Approximately twenty-five boxes hold the correspondence and essays of the Park Commission and Superintendents Theodore Wirth and George A. Parker. Additionally, the collection contains papers concerning Parker's participation in the Hartford Committee on the City Plan, its Juvenile Commission, and other organizations (city and nationwide) related to the parks movement and recreation for urban growth. This material is found in Series II.

Visual materials include over 500 glass negative views of parks and streetscapes, Series III, and a large collection of half-tone printing blocks, Series IV. Many of these reference the park report, or other publication, they illustrated. A collection of colored lantern slides, as well as planting and nursery order lists, document roses planted at Elizabeth Park.

Responsible for the city's cemeteries, the Park Commission's records include documentation of burial ground oversight, plot sales, and the erection of grave markers.

In Series V, Bound Volumes, financial records may be found, including salary information for all parks, and accounts from the Keney Park Trustees, and letterpress books kept by Theodore Wirth.

Especially rich is the archive's collection of maps, blueprints and drawings of cemeteries, and park structures and parkways (actual and projected), which comprise Series VI. Over 150 of these have been inventoried. Please note that the maps do not have titles, simply descriptions.
